I
YORK AND WELLSTON

Warner Robins is a city that was born from the grim necessity of war. In the early 1900's a tiny train, the 'Shoofly,' entered Houston County down near Elberta and its first stop at a small station built on land that was originally the Henry Feagin Plantation. It included most of the land that was originally Robins Air Force Base and the Lewis B. Wilson Airport. This small railway station was located in a tiny middle Georgia town comprised only of one general store, one service station and six houses with about 50 people calling it home.

This small settlement, called York, was located near where Green Street now crosses North Davis Drive. After the station was built, Mr. Feagin was asked to rename the town. He named it Wellston, in honor of William H. Wells, the chief engineer of the Georgia-Southern and Florida Railroad. The reason the station was built so far away from the houses supposedly was that Mrs. Feagin was afraid that if it were any closer, Mr. Feagin would bring all of the train passengers to lunch every day. The people who lived in the small Wellston community were a close-knit group who worked hard to create a small town. There was not as much moving about in those days, and even though neighbors were further apart, they were actually closer than we are today with our busy lifestyles. They eased the load of the
